US demand to grow 4% annually through 2017

US demand for home organization products will increase 4.0 percent per year to $9.4 billion in 2017. The market weakened during the economic downturn that began in 2007, but an ongoing recovery -- particularly a rebound in residential construction and an acceleration in consumer spending -- will support demand going forward. Increases will also be driven by the introduction of decorative and specialty home organization products as well as by strong growth in larger, more expensive closet and garage systems. Preventing even more rapid growth will be a downward pressure on prices caused by the commoditization of many home organization products and competition from producers in low manufacturing cost countries. The well known production methods for many of these products restrain manufacturers' pricing power.

Bins, baskets & totes to remain dominant

Bins, baskets, and totes accounted for the largest share of home organization product sales in 2012, with 36 percent of the total market. These products, which can be decorative or purely functional, are widely used in most households to store and organize belongings of all sizes. Demand for modular units is expected to post the strongest annual gains among home organization products through 2017, allowing these systems to overtake shelving as the second largest product segment. Advances will be supported by the flexibility provided by modular units and by the interest in organizing closets and garages, which account for the majority of modular unit sales.

Garages to post fastest growth among rooms

Sales of organization products used in the garage will see the fastest growth of any segment. To some degree, this reflects the relative immaturity of the garage storage market compared to other areas of the home. However, use of home organization products in garages has risen rapidly, and by 2012 garages had overtaken family rooms as the second leading application for these products. Continued increases in both the share of homes with garages and the average size of garages, coupled with consumer desires to make the space suitable for hobbies or other activities, will support the market for garage storage products. Demand for home organization products used in closets will also achieve above average growth, aided by the rising popularity of high end closet systems made from solid wood or laminated panels, and by rising consumer demand for closet systems beyond the master bedroom. The increasing availability of closet storage products in a variety of retail outlets and at a range of price points will also boost growth.
Bins, Baskets, & Totes

Demand for bins, baskets, and totes will increase 3.0 percent annually to $3.3 billion in 2017. While the rate of increase is lower than the overall pace for home organization products, it represents an improvement coming out of the economic downturn. In addition, demand in 2017 will be $450 million higher than 2012 levels, providing significant opportunities for producers.

Many of the issues affecting the broader home organization industry are also key factors impacting sales in this category. Sales will be driven by factors such as consumer interest in saving time on household chores and better organizing their belongings. The sheer quantity of things owned by the typical household has risen over the past two decades (although the economic downturn that began in late 2007 has disrupted the trend to some degree) and left many homeowners needing a way to organize and store items while keeping them accessible. Furthermore, as homeowners increasingly look to off-site and other longer term self-storage, they purchase sealable bins and totes as a way to protect their items.

Bins, baskets, and totes are among the most basic and affordable home organization goods, which means that these items are often the first home organization products purchased by a consumer. Thus, these products are widely used by younger consumers setting up their first homes as well as by college students moving to and from school and storing goods in small dorm rooms and apartments. In addition, the variety of most bins, baskets, and totes allows consumers to replace items often due to changing needs or styles. These trends all support demand for bins, baskets, and totes. To accommodate consumers, bin, basket, and tote manufacturers typically offer their products in a wide array of sizes and shapes -- in fact, there is often a wide range of sizes of bins and baskets available in almost all materials.
